0.1 Code Retrieving Transcript

This Notebook displays how I retrieved the transcript of music videos on YouTube.

The following code imports the `os` module to interact with the operating system. It then retrieves the current working directory using the `getcwd()` function and prints it out. This is helpful for identifying the directory from which a Python script is being executed, which can be useful when working with files or managing the script's environment.

[2]: # Import the os module which provides a way to interact with the operating_ ↪system, including file management and environment variables.
import os

Get the current working directory
current_directory = os.getcwd()

Print the current working directory
print("Current working directory:", current_directory)

Current working directory: /Users/helgegeurtjacobusmoes/Desktop/Digital Analytics/AB_Test

The next code segment is a Python script designed to collect transcript data from multiple YouTube videos and store it in a CSV file. This script automates the process of collecting transcript data from multiple YouTube videos and organizing it into a structured CSV format for further analysis or use. Here's how it works:

The script begins by importing necessary modules: `csv` for CSV file handling and `YouTubeTranscriptApi` for fetching video transcripts from YouTube. Next, it defines a list named `video_ids` containing the IDs of numerous YouTube videos from the `YouTube_Music.csv`. Then, it opens a CSV file named "YouTube_Music_Transcript.csv" in write mode. This file will store the collected transcript data.

After opening the file, the script writes a header row to the CSV file, specifying column names as "Video ID" and "Text". Moreover, it iterates through each video ID in the `video_ids` list. For each video ID, the script attempts to retrieve the transcript using `YouTubeTranscriptApi.get_transcript(video_id)`.

If the transcript retrieval was successful, it loops through each line in the transcript and writes the video ID along with the transcript text to the CSV file. In case there's an error while fetching the transcript (e.g., due to an invalid video ID), the script prints an error message and writes only the video ID to the CSV file with an empty text field. Throughout the process, the script prints messages indicating whether the transcript for each video is successfully saved or if there's an error encountered.
